Call for Nominations

The governing board of the Cognitive Science Society has opened nominations, including self-nominations, for the editorship of Cognitive Science. Candidates should have broad knowledge of cognitive science, and uphold the Cognitive Science Society's goals of promoting an interdisciplinary science of minds and other intelligent systems. Desirable attributes for an editor include fairness, demonstrated editorial acumen, a strong research record, timeliness, diligence, dedication, and good judgment. The candidate should be available to receive manuscripts January 1, 2006. The initial term for the editor is three years, with an option to extend the editorship by an additional term. The governing board encourages participation by members of underrepresented groups in the publication process and particularly welcomes such nominations.

To nominate a candidate, prepare a support statement in one page or less and address it to the chair of the search committee: Douglas Medin. Informal inquiries can be emailed to medin@northwestern.edu. Nominations should be sent to the executive officer of the society, Thomas Ward, at editor@cognitivesciencesociety.org. The first review of nominations will begin February 1, 2005. Please submit nominations before then to assure full consideration.
